syn SPECIAL, SPECIAL SPECIFIC, PARTICULAR, INDIVIDUAL shared meaning element: of or relating to one thing or class. SPECIAL implies differences that give the thing modified its distinctive quality, character, identity, or use (a special soap for dry skins) and may add a notion of superiority and then come close to uncommon or exceptional in meaning (a hereditary aristocracy with special privileges) SPECIAL may add implications of preeminence or preference (his special friend in that group) (a matter of special importance) SPECIFIC basically implies unique and peculiar relationship to a kind or category or individual (specific nutritional needs of the aged) but in much of its use so stresses the notion of uniqueness as to obscure that of relationship (whether the specific freedoms we know and cherish ... can be maintained — Sidney Hook) or even mean little more than explicitly mentioned or brought to attention (the policy covers only the specific losses mentioned above) PARTICULAR can replace specific in the last use and then stresses the distinctness of the thing as an individual, thus, one gives a specific illustration of a word's use but describes the particular applications of the word. In much of its use particular stands in opposition to general or universal in its stress on individuality (one is apt to amplify a particular judgment into a general opinion — Compton Mackenzie) INDIVIDUAL unequivocally refers to one of a class or group as distinct (it was not the magnitude or multiplicity of burdens that created martyrs and saints; it was the individual capacity to bear suffering — Harry Hervey)

(his answer was bellicose in tenor) (along the cool sequestered vale of life they kept the noiseless tenor of their way — Thomas Gray) CURRENT implies a clearly defined but not necessarily unalterable course (he has not changed the current of our constitutional law — M.
